Treaty of Montevideo and creation of the Kingdom of New Atlantis (Wisdom land)

The Kingdom of New Atlantis (Wisdom land) follows in its creation the provisions of the Montevideo Convention on the Rights and Duties of States, the treaty signed in Montevideo, Uruguay, on December 26, 1933, during the seventh meeting of the International Conference from American countries. The Convention codifies the declarative theory of the state as acceptable as part of international law.

The conference was attended by US President Franklin Roosevelt, who announced the good-neighborly policy that opposes US military intervention in the joint American affairs of North American countries and Latin American continents. The agreement was signed by 19 countries. The admission of three of the signatories was subject to slight reservations. Those countries were Brazil, Peru, and the United States.

The agreement entered into force on December 26, 1934. It was registered in the League of Nations Treaty Series on January 8, 1936 (precursor to the founding of the present United Nations in 1945).

In most cases at that time, the only way to determine the fate of colonial populations or ethno-national minorities was to achieve international legal personality as a nation-state. Most delegates to the International Conference of American States represented the independent nations that arose out of the former colonies. Their existence and independence were disputed or opposed by one or more European colonial empires. They agreed among themselves on criteria that made it easier for other vassal states with limited sovereignty to gain international recognition. This explains why European countries did not sign or invited to attend the conference

Agreement contents

The Convention defines the definition of the state, its rights, and duties. The most famous is Article 1, which sets out the four country standards that international organizations have recognized as an accurate statement of international law:

Article 1 stipulates: - (the State, as per the international law, must have the following qualifications: (a) Permanent Population; (b) Specific Territory; (c) The Government; and (d) The ability to enter relations with other countries.)

1. Permanent Residents: Any country to exist must have a human element, and it is required that these residents be permanent, not just people who come to visit the region. Regardless population figure. There are countries with a population of hundreds of millions, and there are countries with a population of tens of thousands. It is not necessary also for the population to be on the territory of the state, a part of them may be abroad, as refugees for example, and this does not affect the element of sustainability. Permanent residents are the people of the state.

2. A specific territory: it is the geographical area over which the state exercises its sovereignty, and it includes the ground, the internal waters found in the land, and the territorial sea. Based on the region element, the state assumes the so-called territorial sovereignty, with deterrent and effectiveness, it has jurisdiction of the state, that is, it is above the region that monopolizes the exercise of powers. It is a sovereign country and has a protective effect, so no other country may exercise its sovereignty in the region in its place.

The Kingdom of New Atlantis

WISDOM LAND

Profile

Notes on the terms of the territory:

- A. It is not required a complete geographical connection between the parts of the region. Communication between the constituent regions of the state is enough.
- B. No importance to the sprawl of the area. There are, for example, large countries such as Russia and small countries such as Bahrain.
- C. A state can also be based on a specific territory, even if the boundaries of the territory are in dispute.

3. Effective government: who exercises the three legal functions of the state (legislative, executive, and judicial) and administers the region internally and externally. The condition for the existence of government is important, that means the people can govern themselves or are able to exercise their sovereignty.

Question: Should the government be democratic, for example?

Answer: International law main concern is the “actual government” means if the government can extend its authority in the region, exercise the three functions of the state, and express the will of the state in the foreign relations, then this is sufficient for the establishment of the state. As for the government's democracy, it depends on how it respects human rights.

4. Ability to enter relations with other countries: This element can be included in the previous one, means an effective government capable of entering international relations with other countries
